The hip roof house on Rabbit Hill road, or "Bourbon", is a good example of a plain ante-bellum house. Its plainness and hip roof suggest the vernacular taste of its owners, but the interior is clearly the product of catalogue woodwork. The floor plan consists of two parlors with central stair hall in the front part of the house, with dining room in an integral 'L'. Beyond the 'L' is the kitchen and finally service rooms.

In plan it is similar to Maple Grove (on Pentridge) in Kent County, but the pantry in the latter is between the dining room and kitchen, rather than at the end of the house.

The farm is referred to as the Dr. James Bordley Farm, both Sr. and Jr.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The hip roof house on Rabbit Hill Road stands on a tract called "Bourbon". Evidently, the railroad where it crossed the road was called Tilghman's Station or Tilghman's Crossing, a name long gone from the maps of Queen Anne's County.

The house is located on the south side of the road and faces north. It is a five bay wide 'L' plan, two-story hip roof frame structure standing on a low brick foundation. The walls are covered with composition siding. The central entrance of the north facade is a typical mid-19th century unit, with sidelights, transom and double doors. There was originally a porch across three of the five bays, but it was removed within the last 30 years. There is a wide overhanging cornice to the roof. Two large chimneys rise from the center of the roof and one in the back of the 'L'.

Beyond the 'L' is a two story, three bay frame service wing slightly narrower and lower than the main body of the house. The east side of the whole house consists of the following, from north to south: a large window, an entry with leanto porch, and two smaller windows with a door between. The second story has two windows in each section.

The south gable of the service wing has only one door centered on the first story. The west side of the service wing has two windows on each story. Like the east side, the back of the 'L' is slightly deeper than the service wing. It has only one window on each floor.

There are two windows and a door on the south facade of the front part of the house and two windows on its west side.

Inside, the plan of the house is a variation of the mid-19th century ante-bellum plan. Two parlors and central stair passage with a room (Dining Room) behind the east parlor are in the 'L' plan hip roof part. The service wing has a kitchen adjacent and one step down from the dining room. Beyond the kitchen is a storage room and pantry.

The unusual feature of this house is the position of the back stair, a winder in the southwest corner of the dining room. Unlike the usual winder, the bottom step is perpendicular to the wall, thus ascending 90° to the door at the lower end of the stair. Also unusual is the fact that the closet beneath the stair is on a diagonal and the area above the door is filled by two panels with bead around the panels. It appears to be the only vernacular or "built on the job" part of

of the woodwork. All other features appear to be the basic doors, mantels, trim, stair, etc. of the mid-19th century.

All of the walls and ceilings of the first floor service wing appear to have been sheathed with board around the turn of this century. The kitchen has a bricked-in large fireplace backing up to the dining room fireplace. There is a steep enclosed stair on the south wall of the kitchen. In the east parlor, there is a closet south of the fireplace. The fireplaces of this section back up to the central hall. Six windows light the west parlor.

The rooms on the second story are almost identical to those below. Above the service wing are three separate rooms at the head of the steep stair. One of the rooms appears to retain some late 19th century wall paper with boarder. These rooms were not originally connected to the main house; however, a small door in the dining room chamber is a 20th century addition.
